ZOMBIES INVADE

BY: KRISTOF PHILLIPS
Centurion Staff

With enrollment at Bucks dwindling to just a few dozen students, zombie hordes have descended on the Newtown campus and launched what amounts to a battle for survival.

A group of about a dozen students and a few administrators were said to be holed up in the cafeteria, fending off the mindless, brain-eating monsters with guns, clubs and extremely pointy sticks.

Gunfire could be heard echoing throughout the top floor of the Rollins building, punctuated by occasional screams.

Bucks President Stephanie Shanblatt, armed with a semiautomatic weapon, was holed up with several students behind a makeshift barricade of tables and chairs.

“Die you zombie scum,” Shanblatt was heard shouting at the zombies in the distance.

“Say hello to my little friend,” she added, before firing another fusillade of bullets at them.

Bucks’ low enrollment was previously attributed to the improved economy and demographics.

Now the few remaining survivors are rethinking what caused the 6 percent drop experienced this semester.

Science majors across all three campuses now believe the low enrollment is a result of a zombie hoard, which has been slowly invading since last semester’s Zombie Run event held at Lower Bucks.

There appear to be a few strongholds set-up across the Newtown campus for the remaining survivors.

Art students have blockaded themselves in the Hicks Art Gallery, fending off the zombie hoard by stabbing them in the brain with sharpened paintbrushes and pencils.

Other students have used the plethora of textbooks within the Newtown bookstore to build a fort, and have begun rationing the bookstore’s supply of assorted candy bars.

Students who had class in Penn and Founders Halls when the zombies attacked have had great success using the lecture halls to trap and immobilize the zombies.

Wi-Fi plot against students

BY: JENNIFER BELL
Centurion Staff

The Centurion has uncovered a sinister plot, orchestrated by senior members of Information Technology Services (ITS) to prevent mobile devices from connecting to Bucks Wi-Fi.

Working in conjunction with professors around campus, the ITS figured out a way to keep students’ cellphones and other mobile devices from being used to browse the internet and play web based games during class.

“It was feared that an out-right banning of Wi-Fi on Bucks campuses would cause students to riot and hurt the already all-time low enrollment, so we came up with an ingeniously subversive plan,” explained a member of ITS who wished to remain anonymous for fear of losing their job.

“We decided it would be better to make the Wi-Fi connection so terrible and restrictive that students would just give up all hope of ever being able to use the campus Wi-Fi,” the member of ITS explained.

“The plan hinged upon two factors, students would be too cheap to use their data from their 4G networks plan, and the complacency of the Bucks student body.”

The actions of the ITS and the Bucks professors recently came to light when econ professor, Burton Lippmann, unveiled the conspiracy to spite his class.

“The first day of my economics class, our professor told us that if he catches us on our phones, he will take them and post selfies on Instagram. Then I told him that joke is on him because I can’t even get online on campus,” said Jamie Cedar, 22, an education major from Levittown.

“Snickering he turned his head, and exclaimed ‘You’ll never open your emails while I’m lecturing, never.’”

Cedar continued, saying Lippmann went into a mad rant about the ITS and the Wi-Fi conspiracy.

The administration has announced it is letting Lippmann go as a result of “spilling the beans,” according to a press release. Dr. Stephanie Shanblatt, president of Bucks has refused to comment on the scandal.

MyBucks app Trojan horse

BY: MARYANA ZAKHARKIV
Centurion Staff

If you downloaded the MyBucks app on your smart phone since its production date, you may be in trouble. The MyBucks app has been revealed to be a Trojan horse, displaying a user’s private information to fellow users. Pictures, text messages, e-mails, and access to all of one’s social media accounts, are now in the palm of every MyBucks app user’s hands.

When you open the app, and simply type in the student’s name you can see all of this information. Professors are now not the only ones who can access grades as other students can now view them too.

Ellucian, the developer of MyBucks App and the archaic WebAdvisor interface, has announced the app was intentionally designed with this breach of privacy.

James Couden CEO of Ellucian told reporters from his newly purchased Villa in Longji Rice Terrace, China via Skype that he had designed the app for the North Korean, Chinese, and Russian governments to be used in cyber warfare.

Couden released the following statement shortly before jumping off a high dive into a pool filled with what appeared to be $100 bills, in a Scrooge McDuck-like fashion. “With the rise of cyber warfare this kind of project is in high demand by nefarious foreign entities and corporations, all willing to pay out their noses for such an app. Investors obviously want to see what teenagers are doing, sending and hiding from one another. An American community college was just the test run, this is just the beginning,” said Couden.

Currently, the FBI is working with the US State Department to extradite Couden for treason.

President Barack Obama has announced a press conference in the coming week to address this breach of national security.

“Not that I have anything to hide, but this is really scary. I don’t want future employers to see what I’ve been talking to my girlfriend about, or the pictures I took this past weekend at a party,” said Mark Lupert, 17, business administration major from Newtown.

“I feel sick to my stomach, this is just a cruel joke. I found out about the glitch when my boyfriend texted me and told me he knew about me cheating on him, he read all the texts,” said Alyssa Huppert, 20, communications major from Buckingham.

When you type a person’s name in the app, a layout of completely unorganized links gives you the option to click on photos, messages, e-mails and social media panels that are currently on your phone.

Seeing another person’s text messages is now just that easy.

“When I tried deleting things off my phone to see if it still came up on the App, it was all still there. I think whatever information you had on your phone when you downloaded the app stayed on there and so on. My biggest worry is my parents seeing my grades, the app shows official letter grades and that’s something I’ve been hiding from them,” said Candice Ripe, 19, nursing major from Feasterville.

Currently the Bucks administration will not be able to remove the app due to some fine print in its contract with Ellucian, which states the college “may never ever, ever” take the app down.

They even pinky promised not to remove the app.

The administration admits this was a terrible oversight, but defends itself, saying, “Really who would have seen something like this coming? Come on, it is so outlandish it’s barely plausible.”

The Bucks administration is looking into hiring sport contract lawyer Joel Segal, who managed to get Michael Vick his $100 million contract after being jailed for dog fighting.

War on Wi-Fi

has discovered a way to connect mobile devices to the internet via a dial-up connection and has been selling the groups secret to students at the Newtown campus.

Dial-up connections have found their way back from the ‘90s and have been a last resort for students searching for signal.

The group claims it can be used on most mobile devices.

It is rumored the process involves individual scratch-off cards and the Bucks’ pirate radio station, run by Hard Harry.

Word quickly spread to the Bristol campus and continues to reach more students.

One issue some students seem to be having is that it takes about 20 minutes to find a connection, and the famous dial-up melody is still a part of the connecting process, so doing it in class is not an option.

Regardless, students are banning together to show the college that they cannot cut them off from the on-line world and are prepared for a fight.

Students have been using the frustratingly impractical and uncomfortable swivel chairs to pack the zombies in like sardines, then finish them off by bashing in their skulls with blunt objects.

“Who knew these poorly designed swivel chairs could be useful,” said survivor Alex Perks, 19, econ major, while using his microeconomics textbook to flatten a zombie’s head.

Outside zombies litter the campus landscape; making it off the campus alive seems unlikely at this point.

The parking lot and baseball fields have been overrun with zombies.

Students have tried to use Radio Bux to reach authorities outside the campus, but authorities have regarded their messages as a hoax, and refused to investigate further.

There is a rumor spreading amongst survivors that a man dressed in a sheriff’s uniform has arrived on campus.

He has been seen with a woman wielding a samurai sword and a man equipped with a crossbow.

To any survivor reading this, you are not alone.

Housing comes to Bucks in wake of student rioting

BY: COLLEEN HARLEY

Following the lead of close neighbor, Montgomery County Community College, Bucks will add dormitories to their campuses, coming in spring 2016.

The decision was made after students began protesting, and holding live-ins on campus. Housing will be available for all three campuses, and each campus will have two buildings five stories tall.

Most students attending Bucks’ have friends that attend bigger colleges and universities, and when they talk about all the fun things they have at their own schools, Bucks’ students feel like the “odd kid out.”

Tuition is not expected to rise at all, says the Bucks administration.

Brian Williams heals paraplegic

Video footage substantiates Williams’ claim, but many remain unconvinced

BY: JUSTIN BIFOLCO
Centurion Staff

Brian Williams, recently suspended NBC anchor, has reportedly healed a paraplegic man, displaying Christ-like powers yesterday evening.

Williams has been under fire as of late for hyperbolic statements suggesting that he was inside of an aircraft that was in fact under fire, during his time spent reporting the Iraq war.

Williams was checking out of a hotel in Hibbing, Minnesota when a paraplegic man, Bill Knickson, introduced himself.

Footage from the hotel’s video surveillance cameras shows Williams and Knickson having a short conversation followed by Williams kneeling and holding Knickson’s hand.

Immediately, Knickson rose from his wheelchair and stood on his feet.

To the dismay of Williams, his Middletown, New Jersey high school Alma mater, Mater Dei Prep school, and his close friends at the Middletown Township Fire Department, where he was a volunteer firefighter, the majority of citizens in the Delaware Valley County and beyond have shrugged off the claims of his godly actions.

“It’s really shocking to me,” Williams explained. “I am truly baffled at the amount of doubt surrounding my healing a paraplegic war veteran.”

Williams was later reminded Knickson is not a war veteran, and has no affiliation with the military.

Despite the fact that the healing of Knickson was viewed by hundreds of spectators and caught on camera, there is still little praise and much doubt.

“I watched it happen. I was standing no more than three or four feet away. I just don’t know if he’s telling the truth about it,” said eyewitness Alex Smith, 22.

The Centurion was able to have a word with Knickson after the miraculous event occurred.

“Yeah, it happened. I don’t know how much more there is to say other than that. Like, I was paralyzed an hour ago. I haven’t stood on my own in 15 years.”

Knickson was asked to describe Williams in one word, in which he responded “Miracle Worker.”

As of now, Williams is still suspended without pay for his stretching the truth about his ride in a Chinook helicopter in Iraq.

“We just can’t make a decision based off this event. NBC can’t afford to flirt with its integrity in the news business,” said a spokeswoman from NBC.

“Despite my constant viewing of the video showing Williams healing Knickson, and the fog of memory over 12 years, I mean hours, I may have conflated one bystander with Knickson,” she continued.

“I’m sorry I think I misremembered, but I can’t say it makes a difference. Brian’s a good guy, I’m sure he’ll figure it out.”

No negotiations between Williams and NBC have sparked since the doubtful miraculous healing of Knickson.

Skeptics of Williams have dubbed this revelation

Fox News correspondent Geraldo Rivera will air his expose’ on Wheelchairgate during Fox News Sunday with Chris Wallace this weekend.

While the future continues to look dim for Williams, who just helped bring Knickson to his feet for the first time in 15 years, allegedly, he now has one more thing to add to his impressively fabricated resume.

Bucks students go treasure hunting

The map discovered by Bucks students prior to spring break 2015.

BY: MICHELE HADDON
Centurion Staff

Students experienced a real life “Goonies” adventure over spring break at Bucks’ Newtown campus after uncovering a hidden treasure map.

Jason Cooper, 19, history preservation student, had just left class on March 12, when he accidentally discovered what looked like a map leading to treasure buried somewhere around campus.

The class Cooper had been in, History of American Architecture, was held in Tyler Hall that evening.

According to Cooper, he was walking through Tyler Hall headed towards a door leading outside when he accidentally knocked a painting off the wall.

“The painting fell so loudly, my initial reaction was embarrassment and guilt. So I quickly picked up the painting with the intention of hanging it back up before anyone else came by,” said Cooper.

That was when Cooper said he noticed what appeared to be a map sketched on the back of the painting.

“I didn’t know if it was anything important or even real, but I thought it could be worth looking into, so I took a picture of it with my phone before hanging it back up,” said Cooper. “I know this sounds cliché, but it literally had an ‘X’ marked on it.”

Cooper then described how he and three of his friends, also Bucks students, got together over the weekend to take a look at the map and further research its validity.

They carefully studied the map while cross-referencing the history of the Tyler family and their estate.

According to Tracy Gibbons, 20, fine arts major and friend of Cooper, the facts seemed to line up and they felt there was a chance this was a real map possibly dating as far back as the early- to mid-18th century.

The painting itself, called “Petaquiechen” or “The Streams are Rising,” is an oil painting depicting a Leni-Lenape tribal council meeting set at what appears to be Indian Council Rock, according to Patricia Fisher-Olsen, historic preservation coordinator at Bucks.

“This painting was a part of Stella Elkins Tyler’s extensive art collection,” said Fisher-Olsen.

“However, it wasn’t on par with her typical tastes. Apparently, she had received this painting as a gift shortly after moving into the estate and it quickly became one of her favorites.”

Cooper and his friends visited the campus over several days during spring break to try and follow the clues on the map.

However, they reached a dead end when the map led them to the Neshaminy Creek.

“The treasure, or whatever it is that this map leads to, could be buried right under the middle of the Neshaminy Creek,” said Cooper.

“Obviously, we weren’t equipped to go any further at this point.”

“Sure we were disappointed, but we had a lot of fun over those few days. We finally decided it was a good idea to turn our findings over to the college,” said Gibbons.

According to Fisher-Olsen, Bucks put together a committee, made up of faculty of Bucks’ Historic Preservation Department and members of the Tyler Hall Restoration Committee.

This team will work alongside the Newtown Historical Association to extensively research and analyze this newly-discovered piece of Bucks history.

“I can’t say for certain that what we have here is a ‘treasure map,’ but what I can say is we believe we have stumbled upon something very genuine and very significant to the history of Bucks County,” said Fisher-Olsen.

Newtown campus library opens nightclub

BY: TYLER GOLDBERG
Centurion Staff

This week the Bucks Newtown library announced it is banning students from reading within the library, and will be sectioning off a portion of the library to be turned into an exclusive nightclub.

It is well known throughout the student body that the library is the worst place to read or work quietly, and the librarians have fully embraced the noisy atmosphere, casting off the shackles of the stereotypical librarian identity.

Traditionally, librarians are known to be intolerant of loud music, talking above a whisper, and messy food or drink within the confines of a library.

None of these traits seem to apply to Bucks librarians.

In fact, the only thing they find intolerable is students trying to read and work quietly.

So now reading will be banned from the library, and librarians will be sending readers to quieter places around campus, such as, the gymnasium and the cafeteria.

“It is difficult to get work done in the library because of all the noise and the librarians do not seem to care that it is loud in there at all,” said Amanda Pace a 20-year-old Bucks student.

First glimpse at the new exclusive night club, the Dewey Decimal Dance Club (DDDC). The DDDC will be located on the second floor of the library.

In the fall of 2015 the librarians will be opening their night club, named the Dewey Decimal Dance Club, the DDDC for short.

The top level of the library’s second floor will be sectioned off, and the book cases relocated to old portable class rooms located behind Penn and Founders Hall.

It is even rumored Kanye West will be performing on the club’s opening night.

With the library failing to fulfill its intended role the nightclub is a welcome change for most students.

However, dissenting students are finding it difficult to express themselves over the noise from students who refuse listening to music with their headphones in.

The Centurion was able to interview one senior librarian who has expressed reservations about turning the library into a nightclub and banning students from reading.

The librarian wished to remain anonymous for fear of being ousted as the ‘un-cool’ librarian.

“I wanted to have weekly book clubs in the library but my co-workers heckled me, calling me a nerd,” said the librarian, choking back tears.

“They even made fun of my vintage wire rim reading glasses.”

Some students eager to help bring about an end to this unruly environment went about distributing petitions, calling for a return to a quieter, reader-friendly library.

But the librarians refused to allow the students to circulate their petition, saying, “Distributing materials like petitions, pamphlets, flyers and newspapers on second floor of the library only causes clutter and makes it difficult for students to do their work.”

Transformers four: “Age of Boredom”

BY: CHAD SABOURIN
Centurion Staff

When it comes to producers wanting a film to have mindless explosions, product placement, and stereotypical characters while raking in money, they always seem to hire director Michael Bay for this task.

His latest assault on moviegoers’ ears and eyes is “Transformers: Age of Extinction,” the fourth, egregiously unnecessary, film.

One would expect the plot to be another tired rehashing of the relationship between humans and the extraterrestrial Autobots, however that is not the main plot thread.

The main plot thread is the lead Cade Yeager and his daughter Tessa arguing about who she can date and how none of his inventions seem to work.

It’s hard to make that last sentence up, and no it’s not an April Fools’ Day joke.

For what felt like at least half an hour, Yeager argues with Tessa about how she can’t date somebody who’s 20 when she’s only 16-years-old.

Tessa then brings up the Romeo and Juliet law up which according to the film gives Tessa and her boyfriend legal grounds to date.

Who honestly cares? Moviegoers expect action in a film such as this, not a half-baked romance with zero to no chemistry between the leads.

Speaking of action, this Transformers film has the worst action sequences in the entire franchise thus far.

From the choreography of how they filmed the action, to the lack of excitement, this film reeks of fake looking action.

What’s especially annoying, is composer Steve Jablonsky decided to reuse most of his score from his previous Hasbro film, “Battleship.”

You can especially notice this during the first action scene in the film when the FBI is storming a house. It just shows how lazy this film truly is.

It doesn’t help that this film is poorly edited and has way too many cuts during a single scene.

The camera angles are all either at a strange angle, or they’re ogling at women’s body’s in typical Michael Bay fashion.

So if you’re still looking for a good prank to play on your friends this April Fools’ Day convince them to waste 165 minutes of their lives watching “Transformers: Age of Extinction” as it strings together government conspiracies, dating, robots and plots to conquer the world.

Hip Hop Hype: Kanye West comes to Bucks

BY: JEFF GADZINSKI

Hip-hop sensation, multi-millionaire and fashion icon Kanye West will be visiting community colleges across the country giving motivational speeches.

Of course our prestigious community college is on this rumored short list of schools set to be lucky enough to be graced by the presence of the Hip-hop icon himself.

After all, our transfer program, fantastic staff, and student success leaves us high above the rest of the pack.

After hearing the announcement President of Bucks Dr. Stephanie Shanblatt had this to say, “Well I was sitting in my car listening to West’s “Gold Digger,” when I got the call confirming Kanye’s visit. I paused my CD player and sat in silence, amazement.”

This platinum selling artist once struggled as a community college student, and his ego was not always as ridiculous as it is today.

A community college dropout himself, it is expected that West will grace Bucks with his presence within the next few years.

Or decades. We will let the creative genius take his time.

We do not want to rush him, and urge anyone who knows what West enjoys to eat or drink, what style drapes he likes, if he likes ice in his beverages, please let us know, as any information will help.

Him and his ego must be satisfied.

Pirate radio discovered below Bucks

Student housing construction crew unearths once-fabled pirate radio station

BY: JUSTIN LUCZEJKO
Centurion Staff

While many Bucks students were shoveling snow and filling out their NCAA Tournament Brackets over spring break, the contractors working on the new on-campus student housing project unearthed quite a spectacular discovery.

After hearing a high-pitched noise emanating from a pipeline underneath the school, two electricians followed the old, unused pipeline, about the length of a football field, toward the sound.

What they found next was astounding.

“After following this rusted pipe for approximately 300 feet under the school, we stumbled upon a Shawshank Redemption-style tunnel that led us to a solid-steel door with the words “TALK HARD” spray-painted in red and black block letters,” said head electrician Milo Aukerman.

Bewildered and a bit hesitant, the two workers knocked on the door and were greeted by an unfamiliar but friendly face.

According to Aukerman, a man in his mid- to late 40s wearing a “13 Rooms of Doom” t-shirt and rocking a full-fledged mullet, shook their hands and said, “Welcome, I’m Hard Harry”.

For the first time, Bucks’ folklore pirate radio station was uncovered.

As the men from the construction crew stepped into this bunker-style room which was strewn from one end to the other with empty cans of Crystal Clear Pepsi, torn Garbage Pail Kid wrappers and cans of Aquanet, it became clear to them that Harry had been “talking hard” for decades, just as Bucks’ famed-legend had suggested.

The bunker itself was a total mess, except for the music collection which was categorized by genre and alphabetized.

His vinyl collection included classic albums by Ice T, The Beastie Boys, Bad Brains, Henry Rollins, Sonic Youth, Soundgarden and The Descendents.

“I was a Bucks archeology major back in the ‘80s. When the school failed to approve an on-campus dig, I decided to sanction one myself and after digging for weeks I found fossilized remains of a prehistoric horse, known scientifically as Equus scotti, which roamed the area during the Pleistocene Era just before the last ice age some 700,000-800,000 years ago,” said Harry.

“To make sure that my findings were kept intact, I decided to build this bunker and well, being a huge fan of Christian Slater, and was inspired by his role as a pirate radio DJ in the 80s cult film ‘Pump Up the Volume,’” continued Harry.

While Harry wasn’t willing to elaborate on exactly how long he had been “transmitting extra ordinary sounds,” as he put it, Hary did go on to explain that he had “borrowed” the once-thought-stolen radio equipment from Bucks’ former radio station, WTYL aka “The Underwear Network.”

The WTYL operated on-campus directly across from The Centurion through the ‘80s and ‘90s.

It was evident that Harry was extremely proud to be one of the only still standing Terrestrial AM pirate radio stations in the US.

After learning the news

of the discovery, Ben Ryan-Yankowy, president of Bucks’ Radio Bux, had more questions than answers.

“We have consistent bandwidth issues with our software, what has Hard Harry been doing different all these years to maintain his legacy? And furthermore, where’s he been going to the bathroom?”

While Harry did say he only leaves the radio station about once a year to follow his childhood heroes Gwar to live shows at several different venues around the Delaware Valley, he also had this to offer about what it takes to maintain a pirate radio station in an age where many teenagers have never even seen a radio dial.

“If I’m being totally honest with myself, I feel absolutely no sense of competition with the thousands of local podcasts that kids are doing from their bedrooms and not in premier underground bunkers like I have here,” said Harry.

Bucks officials have decided to allow Hard Harry to continue broadcasting from the bowels of the college.

His antenna reach goes no further than Tyler State Park and causes absolutely no complications with the FCC.

NCAA snubs Bucks’ basketball teams

BY: RYAN ERNEY
Centurion Staff

For the 50th consecutive year, the Bucks men’s basketball team has been snubbed out of the NCAA tournament.

It is a slap in the face to the program, which also for the 50th consecutive year was not even invited to participate in the NIT tournament either.

Head coach Donald Perry was hoping for anywhere between a 12-16 seed for his Centurions, yet once again Selection Sunday has arrived and the collegiate team finds themselves on the outside looking in.

The sting of 50 straight years without a birth in the NCAA tourney is especially painful because Bucks has been around for exactly 50 years, meaning that the blue and white have never made an appearance or really even come to close to being in the Big Dance ever in their history.

The student body once again has not been shy about voicing their opinions on the matter.

again” said Ryan Jacobs, 20, a communications major from Levittown.

Although some other local schools have been more fortunate than Bucks, they would be quite hesitant to call themselves lucky.

Temple University has been invited to participate in the NIT tournament, which was a disappointment for them because they were expecting a spot in the NCAA tourney.

Villanova University lost in the round of 32, which was also extremely upsetting for them because they were projected to go much further as a one seed.

However, both of those clubs at least got a better deal than Bucks, who can only muster their best to watch other premier college basketball programs that aren’t themselves on TNT, TBS, ESPN, and CBS for the rest of March and part of April.

As if the raw deal that the men’s basketball team received wasn’t enough, the women’s basketball team also failed to receive an invite to either the NCAA tournament or the NIT.

With the 76ers mathematically out of playoff contention, the Flyers out of playoff contention, the Eagles in off-season, the Phillies providing absolutely no hope for the 2015 season, Villanova eliminated from the tourney, and now Bucks’ basketball season at a close, the student body and other residents among the Bucks County area must turn to unconventional sports in order to get their fix.

As if the initial disappointment wasn’t enough, Bucks’ also thought that they had landed former Philadelphia 76ers point guard Michael Carter-Williams via trade, only to find out that he was actually acquired by the Milwaukee Bucks. The similar team name caused the confusion.

The 6-foot-6-inch former NBA rookie of the year would have been a huge boost for the Centurions chances of making the tournament in the future, but now it appears that they will have to find their talents elsewhere.

The only thing that is left for the basketball teams at Bucks is to keep plugging along, and hopefully next year will be the first year that the selection committee opens their eyes and acknowledges the fact that Bucks’ has a great team.

Chip Kelly: Oregon rules, Philly drools

University of Oregon celebrates Chip Kelly’s decision to move the Philadelphia Eagles to Eugene, Oregon

Head coach of the Philadelphia Eagles Chip Kelly likes one key factor in his players more than anything else – if they played their college football at the University of Oregon.

In fact, he would rather have a player if they attended Oregon than one of the most talented players in the league.

Kelly traded running back LeSean McCoy for a linebacker, Kiko Alonso, who can’t even play due to a torn ACL.

Does Chip know that he can’t even step on the field and play for him? Alonso spoke on the trade saying, “it’s a shame I can’t really help the team out with my injuries, but if Chip wants me on the roster I guess I have to start developing my water boy skills.”

Philadelphia Eagles owner Jeffrey Lurie also spoke on the subject.

“We trust Chip throughout this process . . . he knows what’s best for this team,” he said with confidence.

Maybe Kelly will take advantage of this support and turn this into the team he desires.

NFL Insider Chris Schefter said that word circulating is Kelly has contacted at least thirty former Oregon players already.

“I wouldn’t be surprised if he started going after kids at Oregon right now to come play for him,” said Schefter.

The Eagles have been in talks with the NFL about moving the team to the state of Oregon and play in the city of Eugene.

Another rumor circulating around the league is that

Kelly wants to trade for his most prized possession, his favorite washer and dryer from back when he coached at Oregon. The deal is reportedly going to send a total of seven draft picks throughout the next four years.

The only concern is that he wants the dryer to become the next Eagles starting quarterback.

Kelly has had praise for this dryer, saying, “I really liked the way he dried my clothes a couple years back . . . I saw him throw the ball once, and thought he could become a star.”

“I see him winning multiple championships here in the NFL.”

The dryer has also spoken out on the possibility of the trade.

“I think the world of Chip, I know he believes in me and I’m just going to try and help this team win,” said the dryer.

With the finalization of the trade, Vegas has completely changed the Eagles odds of winning the Super Bowl this upcoming year.

They were set at a tough 20-1, and now they are at 2-1 odds.

Coming up second is the Seahawks at 500-1, compared to their 12-2 before the massive trade.
